

If you have an old, clunky computer that is no longer in the running for any major upgrades, you might want to consider donating it to a worthy cause. To find out, just follow these simple steps: - Go to your local library. There they will ask for your old computer specs so they can put it on their list of computers waiting to be refurbished or recycled. They'll also let you know what the organizations are in need of when they accept donations. - Make sure when donating your computer is in good condition and completely powers up! If not, bring it by the library so that they can test it out before accepting it into their system. - Contact the organization about what they need for your computer. If you have a desktop or tower that is no longer being used, perhaps a local library needs one to be able to run programs for their patrons. Or maybe a family in need has been approved for a new laptop from the organizations that accept donated computers and they need yours to fill the spot. - Give them your computer and watch as they breathe new life into it! Many charitable organizations will donate computers to people in need, and will even put it on their website so you can follow the journey of the machine once it goes out into the world under someone else's control. Hurricane Sandy destroyed or damaged many homes and businesses, including many computer systems. People throughout the United States were forced to sacrifice their possessions for the well-being of others. In New York City alone, thousands of computers were lost when people evacuated from the city. In addition, large numbers of citizens from throughout the United States volunteered their time at local computer recycling centers in order to donate their unused computers to charitable organizations in need within their respective communities. These volunteer efforts in providing needed resources in a crisis situation have been known to significantly improve quality of life for those affected by a disaster. One of the most well known charitable organizations to provide donated computers to people in need is The Salvation Army. With its longstanding record of service on local, national, and international level, The Salvation Army has been able to provide shelter, food, clothing and emotional support to millions throughout the United States. They are one of the world's largest providers of social services.
